

Editor's Note

Poh Li Lau<sup>a</sup>

<sup>a</sup>Department of Educational Psychology and Counselling, University of Malaya

I am pleased to present Volume 7, Issue 2 of the Asia Pacific Career Development Journal. This latest issue features two review articles representing scholars from the United States and, for the very first time, includes a book review.

Review articles are essential in scholarly journals as they synthesize and critically evaluate the vast body of research on specific topics, providing researchers with comprehensive and updated insights. By integrating findings from diverse studies, these articles not only elucidate current understanding but also highlight emerging trends and identify gaps in the literature, thereby guiding future research.

The lead article is a systematic review that examines how parental acculturation affects children's career choices and stresses the importance of further research into intergenerational acculturation and its impact on the career development of Chinese Americans. The first review article presents a culturally informed review of the career challenges faced by Chinese international students in the United States and the impact of cultural factors on their career readiness. Lastly, the final review article is a book review of the recently launched book Practice Principles: Career Theories and Models at Work. This book review is valuable because it offers an assessment of the book's content, guiding readers in evaluating its significance, quality, and impact on the field of career development.

In conclusion, I extend my sincere gratitude to all readers, authors, editors, and reviewers for their unwavering support and dedication, which have been instrumental in advancing the journal to its current standing.